Mimicking the time-worn feel of a piece of architectural salvage, the Pagoda Hexagonal Stool has a steel frame covered in gray concrete that has been wire-combed to achieve a naturally textured finish. This handy accent piece, which would be just as perfect in an urban oasis as it would a lake house or a strikingly contemporary setting, will never slack on performing its coffee-time or drink-time duties! Hairline cracks occur and are part of the natural beauty and uniqueness of each piece. These are part of the natural curing process of concrete, but they do not affect durability or structural integrity because of the steel frame underneath. The finish will vary and range from gray to brownish to greenish. The finish will continue to change over time, and over the first few months it will darken slightly. Each piece is created by hand, and the texture and appearance of the concrete can vary.
